

TYLER TAKAHASHI (continued)

By the time I'm 40, I hope I'm.....

- A manager at a successful company and raising a happy and healthy family.

Is it easier or more of a challenge to express your Catholic identify at this point in your life?

- It is definitely more difficult. Even at a Catholic college, it is harder to express my religion because there are a lot of people here with many different religious beliefs.

What will be the most difficult adjustment once you start working:

- Just learning how to be an adult in general. Growing up I never thought much about the responsibilities that go along with being an adult but I know people will have certain expectations of me as a college graduate.
- I'm also going to have to learn how to budget my money better once I have a regular salary.

How do you see yourself contributing to society?

- I have also done some volunteering around the Green Bay community that inspires me to give more of my time to worthy causes as I go through life.

What motivates you?

- My family has always motivated me. My parents have helped me and been extremely supportive throughout my schooling, sports career and life and I really want to be successful for them as well as myself.

I will consider myself a success in life if.....

- I am happy with my career and still enjoy great relationships with my friends and family.

After living in Green Bay for four years, where do your NFL loyalties lie.....

- I was, still am, and will always be a Bears fan.
