Emotional Survival for Communications Personnel

Recently, considerable attention has been given to the emotional well-being of law enforcement officers, yet one of the most Critical links in the law enforcement process remains overlooked. Communications personnel are the first contact for victims needing law enforcement, medical aid, or fire service responses. In many instances, the communicators determine the difference between life and death, yet they are left with only the crisis portion of the story. While officers see the end result, communicators are deprived of that closure, leading to a significant emotional toll that accumulates until it erupts.

Emotional Survival for Communications Personnel will examine the hard facts of the job and provide tips and tools for dealing with ‘those calls’ that a dispatcher will endure for years. All emergency response personnel are at risk for emotional death, and communicators are no exception. This one-day course will bring the real world into the classroom, giving your communicators the skills and knowledge to recognize the signs of crisis in themselves and their co-workers and the intervention tools to help.

Workshop Content:

- ❖ Predicting the Unpredictable and Managing Stress
- ❖ How does it affect us as dispatchers?
