Figuring out new and innovative ways of supporting people with disabilities and helping them make connections in the community can be a fun and exciting process. Unfortunately, however, being concerned about "what we should do" can often keep us from imagining "what we could do."

In this day-long workshop filled with humour, stories, music, and likely more than a few "Aha" insights, Peter Leidy, Norman Kunc, and Emma Van der Klift help participants rediscover the creative and playful nature of support. Emma and Norm share lessons learned from living with a disability and how a defiant refusal to "be realistic" can open up new and alternative ways of solving seemingly unsolvable problems. Peter then engages with participants on how they use these insights to create novel and unconventional ways of providing support.
