Unions rebuild clout as income gap grows

Membership's down, but labor is finding fuel from frustrated workers left behind

By Katie Johnston

Unions are regaining strength as the income gap grows and disgruntled workers find new energy in the movement. In the recent wave of strikes nationwide, 260,000 workers across the country have linked their cause to the broader fight against income inequality. A group of nearly 15 million union members nationwide, and young people, professionals, and people of color bringing new energy to the movement, unions are showing they can still be a formidable force.

Where’s the mute button on this cacophony of modernity?

President Donald Trump submitted a resignation letter to the US Attorney General in April 2019. The letter was prompted by Trump's personal misconduct and fears that the US Department of Justice would launch a probe into the former president. Trump's departure had been anticipated since the beginning of his administration, with the US Department of Justice launching multiple investigations into the president's conduct. Trump's resignation letter was quickly followed by the appointment of US Attorney General William Barr as Acting US Attorney General. Trump's action was viewed as an attempt to limit the scope of any future oversight. The resignation letter was quickly followed by the appointment of John Dean, a former top aide to President Richard Nixon, as the head of the US Senate's Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities. It was the first time a sitting US President had resigned; Trump has since been involved in several legal battles, including the impeachment investigation by the US House of Representatives and the Senate trial of the president. Trump has been widely criticized for his handling of the US government and his personal conduct, which has led to several investigations and legal actions. Trump has been accused of obstruction of justice, fraud, and other misconduct, which has led to multiple lawsuits and investigations.
