The Project offers our communities a way to examine the critical and persistent issue of racism. Working with trained volunteer facilitators and a well designed curriculum participants will engage in interactive experiences to examine the realities of institutionalized racism, internalized racism and white privilege, and understand how they feed ongoing racial injustice.

Our eight meetings over a period of three months will be designed so that all participants have a voice as we respond to the program materials and share our own life experiences. Participants are asked to make a commitment to attend all eight two-hour sessions. The final session will bring together both groups in a social setting where we can share our personal action plans for racial justice.

Here is a brief breakdown of our sessions. We will cover the issues of systemic racism in our institutions, internalized racism, white privilege, the myth of reverse racism, targets and allies, and the myths and facts about immigrants and immigration. Each session is part instruction and part interactive experiences. There will be some assigned readings between sessions.
