After visiting New Orleans for the first time in over 2 decades, I read the book, The Feast of All Saints by Anne Rice, historical fiction set in the 1840's about the free people of color. I've never read any Anne Rice books and I discovered that she is a terrific writer! It intrigued me that she wrote all kinds of books about vampires and witches. She renounced the devout Catholicism of her childhood at age 18 and didn't return to it until 1998 at age 57. Ten years later she published a book , Called Out of Darkness: A Spiritual Confession about her return to the faith of her youth. She devotes many chapters trying to explain how her childhood faith was formed, a few explaining why she left the church and then probably the most important part of the book—what it was like to return to the church—are just a few final chapters. She manages to pack quite a lot into those last chapters and explain what she is feeling and what she thinks God is calling her (and us) to do. This book was not in our public library so I purchased my own copy and I have donated it to the church library. Even if you are not an Anne RIce fan, you will be intrigued as this excellent writer puts pen to paper and tries to explain what Jesus means to her and how her behavior has changed over time. I highly recommend it!
