June 2019

In the upcoming summer months we are busy outdoors taking advantage of the Wisconsin weather. Reading can and should be an important part of that outdoor experience. Here are some ideas to think and READ creatively this summer:

Write Letters: letters to family, friends, or even a favorite book author whether on a postcard or through email add real purpose to writing.

Journaling: a special notebook can be the genesis for a summer filled with writing. Parents can start with a prompt at the top or can add a comment at the bottom in response. Daily writing, even just a few sentences back and forth can prompt real insight and conversations about experiences.

Make Lists: books they want to read over the summer, favorite places to walk or ride their bikes, recipe ingredients needed at the grocery store, things that are green that they have seen outside that day. The ideas are endless. . .
