

Corey Hill, a lifelong Republican, is a grocery store operator, cattle and poultry farmer, and the mayor of Douglas in Marshall County. Corey balances the demands of agriculture and public service with a steady hand and a passion for community development. His grocery store not only serves as a vital hub for local families but also reflects his commitment to supporting local producers and ensuring food access for all.

On his 4th generation family-run farm, Corey raises both cattle and poultry, maintaining a strong connection to the land and the values of hard work and sustainability. His expertise in farming informs his understanding of the challenges faced by rural communities, particularly small-scale producers. By staying hands-on in his agricultural operations on an actual working farm, he brings firsthand knowledge to conversations about food security, land use, and economic development in the region.

As mayor, Corey is known for his approachable leadership style and practical problem-solving. He champions initiatives that strengthen local infrastructure, promote small businesses, and preserve the town's rural character. Whether working with town council, checking on livestock, or helping customers in the grocery aisle, Corey exemplifies a spirit of service and resilience.

In addition to serving as Mayor, Corey serves on the State Poultry committee, is a graduate of Leadership Alabama, a graduate of Marshall County Leadership Challenge, and ALFA Leaders Class II.

Corey's leadership style and extensive knowledge in the actual day to day operations of running a working farm and a small business, will translate well to serving as Alabama's next Commissioner of Agriculture.
