“The True Story of Cinderella” by Richard L. Conlon

Boy, did the "evil" stepsisters and stepmother get a bum rap. They tell their side of the story.... about how little Cinderella martyred herself into subservience and squalor, about how she gave up control of her life waiting for the right man to take care of her, and about how her two stepsisters, Anastasia and Drizella, used education (Master's degrees in finance and chemical engineering, respectively.) to come out on top. Cinderella has made herself into a hapless, hopeless, and helpless that when the big ball comes, Mama has to pretend to be a fairy godmother ("Whatever that is?") to convince her to go. Then they have to try to make sparks fly between Cinderella and the Prince so that they can finally get her out of the house. A delightful twist on an all-time favorite story!

Act Two is an all school show.

Whodunit? by Anne Coulter Martens

A Farce in one act:

The detectives may not know who the killer is but the audience knows. An announcer gives them the facts. There is the fun of watching the experts- and the amateur- as they struggle to solve the dire murder. Is it the butler? Is it Grandma? The sinister character? It just couldn't be sweet Alice! The wind howls, lights flicker and bloodcurdling screams are heard.... some shore done it!
